Notable features: Originally called "Linden Terrace," these three large houses represent a rather uncomfortable union between the severe Baltimore row house facade and the stylish Mansard with metal trim, dressy windows and other details. Like the houses on the Square, these should be protected and rehabilitated.

N.B. Between the 1930's, when the picture in the Pratt Library Maryland Room photograph collection was taken, and 1975, the window openings in the southern-most house have been altered by the introduction of arched window openings. Number 22 has more recent modifications to the entry column capitals, its cornice and dormer windows; it has also lost its roof iron. There are handsome metal yard fences.

Environmental context:

The houses opposite have been demolished which damages the street but does not qualify the importance of these buildings.
